Economy, Justice and Society (EJS) is an interdisciplinary program involving faculty in the departments of Economics, Sociology, and the School of Education. The program focuses on understanding the factors and processes that influence the social, cultural, and economic success of individuals and groups.

Kimberlee Shauman, Associate Professor of Sociology, directs the program. She is assisted by a faculty committee consisting of Michal Kurlaender and Heather Rose (Education), Erin Hamilton (Sociology), and Ann Stevens and Giovanni Peri (Economics).

The program continued the "Determinants of Economic Success" seminar series with four speakers during the 2011-12 academic year. Daniel S. Hamermesh (Harvard, Economics) presented work from his book, Beauty Pays; Katharine Edin (Harvard, Sociology) presented new research for her in-progress book on fatherhood in the lives of low income unmarried men; Thurston Domina (UCI, Education and Sociology) spoke about “Mathematics Curricular Intensification and Inequality in American High Schools, 1982-2004”; and Matt Huffman (UCI, Sociology) presented results from his study of the impact of female managers on gender inequality in hiring and promotion.

This year the major EJS activity was a conference on the topic of Immigration and Poverty: Economic and Social Conditions, Policy Approaches. The conference was co-sponsored by the Economy, Justice and Society Program, the new Center for Poverty Research and the Institute of Governmental Affairs. The organizers were Erin Hamilton, Giovanni Peri and Kim Shauman.

The mobility of people across national boundaries as an exceptional economic force and catalyst for social and cultural change, but it is also a source of significant policy challenges. This interdisciplinary conference brought together scholars studying the connection between migration and the economic development of individuals, markets, and states in both sending and receiving countries.

The first day of the conference featured cutting-edge research by economists, sociologists, and demographers, addressing three themes: “International Migration and Global Poverty,” “Immigration, Jobs and Wages,” and “Undocumented Immigrants and Their Assimilation.”

The second day examined “Immigration Policy: Current Limits and Potential for Reform” with a moderated discussion among immigration experts from the fields of law, economics, and sociology.
